How We Learned to Start Worrying and Fear the Bomb
Paul R. Schwoebel

US national and homeland security activities have concentrated a significant fraction of our countries financial, scientific, research and development resources on the detection of Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMDs). I will discuss the key issues associated with the detection of WMDs. After reviewing the detection technologies in use and under development we will see that a purely technological solution to this problem may be illusive and that ultimately the answer to preventing a nuclear catastrophe must include political, social, and economic avenues.
